Office hours: to be arranged, or by appointment

This general history course surveys selected topics of major political, social, and cultural events and characters in China from the late-Qing period to the eve of the People's Republic of China. It examines some of the important political, economic, social, and cultural change in China between the 1830s and the 1940s, and to review how these changes helped shape the course of historical development in Chinese society, economy, politics, and culture.

ILOs: Identify major forces of historical development in this period; general knowledge of major historical events and figures in the late-Qing and Republican period; deconstruct and understand the motives behind the official Chinese narratives of various historical episodes in modern period; glimpses of the complexity of historical issues, such as the role of opium in the first Sino-British War, the nature and impact of imperialists' invasion of China, and so on; learning the basic skills of writing a decent history paper.

Reading Materials

All the required reading materials (including some optional readings) can be found on the course's LMES site; hard copies of most of these readings are also put on Reserve for your consultation. Optional reading materials could help broaden your knowledge on different subject matters, and some of them show how a specific historical event or figure is described in official Chinese history textbooks, but are not to be examined.
